

It's almost too picturesque I thought as I stood in Mark and Abbie Nelson's circular roundabout and stared. The tree canopy I had just driven through led me there – to a place where Angus cattle grazing golden pastures meet rolling vineyards of zinfandel and petite sirah, the San Francisco coastline a mere 100 miles in the distance.

This can't be real, I teased about the rest: the state flag dancing in the breeze, the big red barn, the grinning young cowboy with his loyal dog, Ike.

For pictures later, I would want the good light. But then again California always has the good light.

The Nelsons, while both native Californians, hailed from different parts of the Golden State only to end up in Wilton with a combined four kids in tow. Since the 1984 move and beginning of Five Star Land and Livestock they've lived plenty of real days.

The home along the Cosumnes River is their beautiful oasis but separate from California it will never be. Issues of dust or truck length, water rights or taxes – it seems it would be a relief to move to a more secluded spot, build fences high and lock the gates. Instead, Mark and Abbie stay in the middle of it all.

“We have a big job to do and that's to gain the trust of the end consumer, to make sure they know we have a safe product,” Abbie says.

So with that notion began their open-gate policy – rather gates were never built – and the result is an ever-increasing number of guests who visit, ask questions and leave with an understanding and a family tied to it.

“As a kid, it was pretty cool not always meeting somebody in a cowboy hat,” Ryan Nelson says. The duo's fifth and youngest son runs commercial Angus with his family nearby while oldest sister, Andra, does the same across the border to Oregon. “You often get to see somebody in tennis shoes trying to learn about beef.”

“We've had Polish, Chinese, Japanese. We'll have a Vietnamese group this month,” Abbie rattles off. To her it's a no-brainer, an absolute necessity of the industry she loves. But for those who know this life, consumer transparency comes at a cost, at a minimum time from other responsibilities, one the Nelsons are willing to bare.

“Our family's story and the Angus industry's story are worth sharing with city people,” Abbie says. “Once we get them here their comments become ‘I didn't know that!’ I didn't understand this.’ They can do a complete 180 in an afternoon.”

And we're all better for it.

Thanks for allowing me to tell your story,

Laura

PS – When the Nelson's aren't hosting eight graders or international groups, they run a registered Angus herd. Check back on Monday to see how they select genetics for their customer base and what they look for in an Angus cow.

(resource: <http://www.blackinkwithcab.com/2016/09/02/yes-absolutely/>)